Group of academic recruitment field: 08/C – Design and technological planning of architecture;

Academic recruitment field: 08/C1 – Design and technological planning of architecture;

Academic discipline: ICAR/11 – Building production;

Research program:

The study of self-supporting construction systems represents an interesting opportunity for the investigation of new automated constructive techniques, carried out through the knowledge of historical construction systems.

Structures like arches, vaults and domes, owe a considerable part of costs and realization times to the need of centring, which goes along the construction from the beginning of the construction phase until its completion.

Historically, several self-supporting technologies have been developed in order to eliminate or reduce these temporary structures, still used today in developing countries, where materials cost is definitely prevailing on labour cost.

The proposed research project aims to investigate a possible development of self-supporting construction systems, in order to significantly reduce construction costs, starting from an assessment of historical construction systems, like the "herringbone" or the "Nubian" systems, with a view to an implementation of partially or totally robotized realization methods.

Moreover, recent studies shows the possibility of automating the construction and optimization of self-supporting masonry shells.

In the first phase of the research, the most suitable historical construction techniques will be identified, among the most promising ones, in order to be implemented through the use of anthropomorphic robotic systems.

Later, a series of algorithms for the automation of self-supporting masonry structures will be defined and optimized, with a particular attention to a use which is aware of the main physical-mechanical properties of these structures.

The aim of this work will be therefore to recover old construction techniques, in such a way to valorise them through innovative tools which can give rise, in a next future, to new research topics and applications.

It is requested a relevance of the candidate's previous research activity or thesis to the topics of the project, in addition to previous experience in the field of parametric design, of numerical analysis for discrete element method and their implications in historical and architectural field.

Possible experiences abroad in the field of modelling and form finding for masonry systems will be considered.

Positions: no. 1

Group of academic recruitment field: 12/D - Administrative and tax law;

Academic recruitment field: 12/D1 - Administrative law;

Academic discipline: IUS/10 - Administrative law;

Research program:

The Code of Public Contracts and Concessions (Legislative Decree No. 50/2016) regulates various manifestations of subsidiarity that characterizes the relationship between the public and private actors, resulting in different hypotheses of collaboration aimed at the satisfaction of general needs. These provisions implement a specific constitutional principle (art. 118, paragraph II) where horizontal subsidiarity is affirmed alongside vertical subsidiarity, which operates between territorial entities at different levels.

A first dynamic of subsidiarity is the social partnership: the activity of private citizens contributes to satisfying the needs of their own community.

A second dynamic is the contractual form of public-private partnership that involve the private economic operator in the financing, design, construction, management and maintenance of public works, including the subsequent supply of public services.

Finally, the third dynamic of horizontal subsidiarity is the institutional partnership, recently regulated by the Public Companies Code (Legislative Decree No. 175 of August 19, 2016).

The legislation shows that the target is the promotion of all forms of collaboration between the public and private sectors to prevent inactivity caused by the insufficiency of public resources, the degradation of infrastructures and the absence of services.

The research requires in-depth scientific study of the forms of public-private partnership introduced by the legislator, to evaluating the regulatory solutions' effectiveness, in the absence of the sector governance system. To this aim, comparative studies of the regulations and experiences of the main European countries will be carried out.
