RESEARCH PROJECT – Code 1

“The Mereology of Ordinary Objects”

Research structure: Department of Letters, philosophy, communication

Duration of the grant: 24 months

Scientific Area: 11 - History, philosophy, pedagogy and psychology

Academic recruitment field: 11/C1 Theoretical philosophy

Academic discipline: M-FIL/01 Theoretical philosophy

Scientific Director: Prof. Andrea Clemente Maria Bottani

Ordinary objects raise several interesting questions concerning their mereology. For instance, it seems obvious that ordinary objects, such as tables and trees, admit of natural and less than natural decompositions into their parts. A hammer is naturally decomposed into its head and handle, while less so into its top and bottom halves. However, the two decompositions are both equally meaningful and correct from a mereological point of view. Can the difference be captured through an ontological distinction between the relations at stake? Some philosophers, like Baker (2007), Canavotto and Giordani (2020) and Sattig (2019) have advanced definitions of natural parthood, but much work is left to do to develop a complete theory of natural parthood for ordinary objects. Moreover, provided the distinction between ordinary objects and their constituting portions of matter is ontologically substantive, rather than a mere linguistic phenomenon, it is unclear what the mereological relation between them is. Is it proper parthood, as Koslicki (2018) and Lowe (2013) claim? Or are they disjoint, as claimed instead by Baker (2007) and Lipman (forthcoming)? Last, the modal strength of the relation between ordinary objects and their parts is not trivial. Some Neo-Aristotelian philosophers, like Inman (2018) and Oderberg (2023), have recently developed varieties of Reverse Mereological Essentialism, the thesis according to which the very existence and identity of the parts of an object depend on the object itself. If true, a thesis along the lines of Reverse Mereological Essentialism would call for a revision of the standard claim that parts are more fundamental than their wholes.

RESEARCH PROJECT – Code 2

“Intercultural relations between Iceland and the British Isles in the Low Middle Ages”

Research structure: Department of Languages, literatures and cultures

Duration of the grant: 24 months

Scientific Area: 10 – Antiquities, philology, literary studies, art history

Academic recruitment field: 10/M1 Germanic languages, literatures and cultures

Academic discipline: L-FIL-LET/15 Germanic philology

Scientific Director: Prof.ssa Maria Grazia Cammarota

Objective:

The project focuses on the intercultural relations between Iceland and the British Isles, particularly in the 12th and 13th centuries. It aims at substantiating the hypothesis of a further route of circulation of figures, manuscripts and texts than the privileged one between Iceland and Norway. Research will shed light on the plurality of commercial, economic, political and cultural ties that characterised medieval Europe, helping to redefine the English influence on the Icelandic literary system in the Low Middle Ages.

Theoretical framework:

Alongside the internal dynamics of the Icelandic cultural system, this research is part of the strand of studies that investigates the intercultural processes and contamination phenomena resulting from relations between the Nordic Germanic area and other traditions, Germanic and extra-Germanic. The close linguistic, political and commercial ties between Iceland and Norway certainly favoured the circulation of manuscripts and texts, especially following the cultural policy of the Norwegian court, which was open to cultural innovations from the Continent. A still little-explored field of research concerns the relations that Icelandic intellectuals had with the English world, particularly in the 12th and 13th centuries, as well as the effects of these cultural exchanges on the literary production of the Nordic area.

Research project description:

The court of Hákon IV Hákonarson, King of Norway from 1217 to 1263, undoubtedly represented a literary hotbed of fundamental importance for the evolution of the Icelandic cultural system. Indeed, the programme of translations of continental narrative texts, particularly French, gave a vigorous impulse to Icelandic literature, giving rise to the successful genre of the so-called “chivalric sagas” (riddarasögur). Recent research, however, has increasingly emphasised the active role of the Icelandic cultural elite in the process of receiving and reworking external cultural stimuli, even beyond Norwegian mediation (Kalinke 2011). Above all, members of the clergy, such as bishops Þorlákur Þórhallsson (1133-1193) and Páll Jónsson (1155-1211), maintained close relations with schools, monasteries and universities on the Continent and/or in the British Isles, facilitating the import of narratives, manuscripts, texts and genres into Iceland. The material coming from the Parisian school of St. Victor or the English cathedral of Lincoln covers a wide range of textual types, including scholarly and encyclopaedic literature of an ecclesiastical nature (Etheridge 2021: 29-58). While the links between the French-speaking and Norse areas have often been the subject of study, if only because of the success of translations of Chrétien de Troyes’ romances (e.g.: Ívens saga), the route between Iceland and the British Isles is less well travelled. The project therefore envisages an in-depth study of the close cultural exchange between these two areas, which led to the acquisition of various types of texts (from universal history, patristic tradition and bestiaries) as well as to initiatives such as the first translation of Thomas of England’s Tristan (Tristrams saga ok Ísöndar, ca. 1226) and Goffred of Monmouth’s Historia regum Britanniae (Breta sögur, ca. 1200) (Kalinke 2011: 12). The intensity of relations between the British Isles and the Nordic world in the 12th and 13th centuries may thus be a fertile research ground for the redefinition of the role of the Icelandic cultural elite and its consequences on literary production.

Key words: Old Norse; Middle English; intercultural relationships; manuscript transmission; translations and rewritings

Time:

The work phases will be indicatively articulated as follows:

- 1) bibliographic investigation, historical and philological research, source retrieval;
- 2) data collection from libraries and institutes relevant to the project (especially in Iceland and Great Britain), with first-hand manuscript examination of codices from both linguistic-cultural areas;
- 3) Selection of a corpus of Icelandic documents from English scriptoria whose examination (palaeographical, iconographic, linguistic) can prove a cross-cultural exchange between the two areas in the 12th and 13th centuries;
- 4) Drawing up studies on the reconstruction of cultural environments (religious and secular), the movement of intellectuals, manuscripts and texts, and the relevance of the results obtained for the definition of the Icelandic literary system.

During the two-year period, the candidate is requested to participate in national and international conferences on project-related topics.

Expected results:

Research aims at reshaping the image of Medieval Iceland from a peripheral place that passively welcomes new cultural instances through Norwegian mediation to a place animated by a dynamic cultural elite, actively seeking opportunities to meet and train for a more incisive integration in the context of European culture.

RESEARCH PROJECT – Code 3

“Religion and Radical Right-Wing Movements in Contemporary Europe”

Research structure: Department of Languages, literatures and cultures

Duration of the grant: 12 months

Scientific Area: 11 - History, philosophy, pedagogy and psychology

Academic recruitment field: 11/A3 Contemporary history

Academic discipline: M-STO/04 Contemporary history

Scientific Director: Prof. Paolo Barcella

Objective:

The project intends to analyze various aspects of the religious dimension of movements defined by scholars as radical, populist or extreme right – think, for example, of the distinctions proposed by Cas Mudde, Federico Finchelstein, Ernesto Laclau. Object of the investigation are political actors and organizations active in European countries, while being aware of the importance that U.S. actors have had and continue to have in this field. With regard to the Italian case, a party such as the Lega Nord (Northern League) has increasingly used religion as a central element of its identity politics since September 11, 2001, when islamophobia became an almost universally present element in the discourses of the U.S. and European right-wingers. As a consequence, the defense of the Christian roots of Europe turned into one of the main aims of the continent's right-wing movements and parties, who have often appropriated and rearticulated the thesis of the "clash of civilizations," initially developed by the U.S. political scientist Samuel Huntington. The focus of the project will not be solely on the forces that have already gained visibility and prominent political roles, but also on less known activists and organizations that nonetheless enrich this landscape with varying degrees of extremism and religious (in the Catholic or, more generally, Christian) identitarian claims. A crucial component of the work of investigation will be considering how the Catholic church has been relating, now and in the past, to these right-wing forces. The Catholic response has varied, from quiet but firm distancing, to legitimization of the themes of extreme right-wingers. The project aims to provide the instruments for a careful understanding of the processes that have led religious identity to become an effective political tool for the advancement of political forces presenting a strong nationalist component and various degrees of authoritarianism.

Theoretical framework:

The study of the phenomena described as radical, populist, and far-right has surged in recent years, thanks to the rise to power of certain American and European political figures. The spread of the ideology and discourses of some political actors in France, Austria, Germany, and other Western nations, even when they did not conquer the majority of votes, has certainly contributed to the undermining of the democratic and liberal foundations of most of these countries. Radicalization and extremism, phenomena exacerbated by the transition of the public debate onto virtual platforms, now underlie the current literature on the emergence and spread of Western right-wing movements. Religion constitutes as well one of the main interpretive frames through which these phenomena are studied. Let us merely think about concepts such as femo- and homonationalism, useful for understanding how some right-wing actors, who make being Christian one of the cornerstones of their identity, stand in contrast to the main enemy: Islam. The reaffirmation of traditional gender roles, which underlies the narrative that sees the heteronormative family under attack by external (ideological and/or political) elements, is one of the main elements in which the current discourse of Western right-wing movements is articulated. This, moreover, has rapidly evolved into one of the most investigated areas of research by those whose goal is to explore the conjunction of political and religious discourse.

Research project description:

The project participates in the current conversation about the emergence, development, and spread of the discourses and ideologies underlying the main radical, populist, and extreme (or far-right) right-wing movements and parties that are changing the political and social landscape of many Western democracies, including Italy, in order to identify how religious elements and symbols are being inserted into their political agendas. The work will be divided into three phases, the first of which consists of identifying the reference elements that will constitute the object of the research, both within Italian borders and among European realities. Then, through a historical analysis of the changes and developments undergone by the main movements and parties under consideration, the work will proceed through a second phase of research and elaboration of the historical material. Finally, the third phase focuses on the specific relationship between the Christian religion (mainly Catholic, but also Protestant) and conservative politics. Here, the focus will be on the characteristics of the discourse of right-wing movements and parties, thus with overtly political goals, and how this exploits trait of the prevailing religious identity in the country. The object of analysis will also be the network of relationships, more or less explicit, between organizations and interest groups of Christian orientation and political groups (party or non-party type) of the extreme right.

Key words: Religion; Radical Populist Right; Nationalism; Family; Gender.

Time:

The project's aim is the writing and submission of at least two articles, and the participation in projects and conferences.

A) In a first phase, an extensive source bibliography will be compiled.

B) In a second phase, fundamental topics of the project will be identified and investigated with reference to specific texts.

C) In the third and last phase, the results of the two previous phases will be re-elaborated. This will lead to the writing of the two papers.

Expected results:

The work carried out within the framework of this project is aimed at producing concrete results and an input into the dialogue developed within this specific field of research. The right-wing panorama in Europe is diverse and constantly developing, which is why there is a need for constant and careful analysis of its components and internal evolutions. The project aims to enrich the literature already produced in this field of inquiry and to provide additional data to delineate the religious dimension of the contemporary European radical right. For this reason, the work will focus on Italy, but without neglecting the network of relationships between right-wing political and social actors from different countries.

RESEARCH PROJECT - Code 4

"Between loss and oblivion. Places and spaces of the industrial heritage of Bergamo and its area"

Research structure: Department of Engineering and applied sciences

Duration of the grant: 24 months

Scientific Area: 08 - Civil engineering and architecture

Academic recruitment field: 08/E2 Restoration and history of architecture

Academic discipline: ICAR 18 History of architecture

Scientific Director: Prof.ssa Monica Resmini

Brownfield sites are real cultural repositories full of historical values. What remains today of the productive activity started in the 19th century shows all its fragility but also its potential as a resource for communities. These assets are also important factors for sustainable territorial development. Facing abandoned industrial heritage (but also the lost one) means taking into consideration multiple aspects. It is not just about examining the production building itself, but also everything that its presence has meant for the area. Industrialisation imposed models of production organization and infrastructural endowment needs that reshaped the appearance and layout of the territory. Any initiative related to the future of these assets must start from a knowledge project, based on their identification as an articulated system. The cataloguing of these assets therefore becomes an indispensable tool. The protection of abandoned heritage is one of the strategic objectives of the Ministero della Cultura, Direzione Generale Archeologia e Belle Arti e Paesaggio, which since 2019 has activated a survey of such cultural assets through the Superintendencies.

Bergamo and its territory still show clear signs of their industrial past. The production facilities that are no longer used today have been catalogued in recent years. The 'Centro per la cultura d'impresa', has set up the "Banca Dati regionale sull'Archeologia industriale", which collects essential inventory data on industrial monuments surveyed in Lombardy between 1982 and 1997. The sheets contain basic data, which should be implemented with other information in order to enlarge the degree of knowledge of the buildings and contexts.

The work involves the creation of a new catalogue record that contains, in addition to the basic data (derived from the above-mentioned records, verified and updated), information about the planimetric and distributive solutions adopted (also in relation to the manuals and specialized literature of the time), the type of construction materials used, the construction techniques, the technologies used, the presence of structures to support production, the provision of services for workers (residential, educational, religious, etc.), the infrastructure, the role of the contractor and that of the designers, the presence of ongoing or completed conservation and reuse projects, the debate on the future of this heritage. This survey represents the foundation of the work and the results, suitably processed, will constitute the contents of the catalogue.
