Research Project:

The attractiveness of university systems through targeted policies is gaining more and more relevance in an increasingly interconnected world (Kwiek, 2009; Civera et al., 2023). The international mobility of researchers and scientists is significantly contributing to the innovation and development of nations (Jenkins, 2017). This trend is supported by a large scientific literature which clearly demonstrates how the mobility of researchers can foster not only scientific productivity, but also the ability to generate innovation and progress through international collaboration and knowledge transfer (Halevi et al., 2016).

A crucial aspect of these policies is their role in diversifying scientific communities within university systems (Niyato et al., 2010). Through international mobility, universities can enrich their knowledge networks, promoting the sharing of expertise, perspectives and scientific approaches from different parts of the world. This exchange of knowledge can lead to greater innovation and the achievement of more effective solutions to complex global problems.

However, repatriation policies based solely on economic incentives may not be the ideal solution to favor the return of researchers to their home countries (Civera et al., 2022). The motivations behind science mobility are complex and vary greatly from individual to individual. In addition to economic factors, career factors, research opportunities, working conditions, personal and family aspirations, as well as cultural and political factors also come into play. Therefore, a policy that focuses only on financial incentives may not be enough to influence researchers' decision to return.

To meet this challenge, a thorough understanding of the motivations and dynamics driving researcher mobility is essential. This requires careful analysis and a broad perspective that considers a variety of factors influencing researchers' decisions to migrate or return. In this context, the international comparison of policies for the attractiveness of university systems plays a crucial role.

Benchmarking can provide valuable insights into which policies are most effective in different circumstances, taking into account national contexts, researchers' needs and international dynamics. By comparing the experiences of different countries, it is possible to identify successful models, innovative strategies and alternative solutions that could have a more significant impact on the mobility of researchers and the growth of the scientific system.

In conclusion, policies for the attractiveness of university systems have become a focal point in the global competition for scientific talent. However, a deep understanding of the motivations and dynamics behind researcher mobility is essential for developing effective policies. The benchmarking approach, which examines policies in different international contexts, can contribute significantly to optimizing the effectiveness of these policies, foster international collaboration and nurture innovation on a global scale.

Research Project:

The objective of the research is to define the skills and competences required to support the transition of manufacturing companies from Industry 4.0 to Society 5.0,

The research, which is part of the European project Co-Creative Decision-Makers for 5.0 Organisations (CoDEMO), will be carried out in collaboration with project partners and will focus mainly on:

green skills and competence linked to circular and green economy in order to make products and processes more sustainable with less waste production;

resilience skills and competence linked to the adaptation capacity in order to increase processes flexibility and responsiveness;

human-centred skills and competence linked to the human factors concepts in order to increase technology acceptance and improve the human-machines interactions;

decision-making skills and competence encompassing trans-sectorial methods, tools and approaches to manage complex systems and evaluate alternative strategies in both short-, mid-, and long-term decision.

Through the analysis of literature and interviews with companies, the research will lead to the definition of a map of key knowledge/skills/competences for the transition to 5.0, assessing the impact of this knowledge on the world of work and education and supporting the definition of training modules aimed at both university students and corporate personnel with a view to life-long learning. To this end, the smart manufacturing research laboratory of the University of Bergamo and the laboratories of the project partner universities will provide the infrastructure and tools to support the development of the identified skills and competences.

Research Project:

Design for circular economy (DfCE) is a design approach that aims at creating products, systems and processes in line with the principles of the circular economy. The main goal is to minimize the waste, maximize the reuse and recycling of materials, and promote long-term environmental sustainability. The main goal of this project is to develop and implement dedicated research strategies and IT tools for design for recycling from a circular economy perspective. More specifically, it aims at exploiting the patent source, which is extremely rich of information on industrial process inventions and mechanical technologies, to create matching between the supply of production waste and the demand for materials for industrial production. Such tools make it possible to enhance traditional services on environmental sustainability and fill the gaps present today in circular economy Marketplace services.
