Memory, Reflexivity, and Personal Identity: Does the Lockean Tradition Rest on a Mistake?

Lockeanism about personal identity is the view that the persistence of persons is grounded in psychological continuity over time. Reflexivism about episodic memory is the view that the content of episodic memories is reflexive: a memory of a past experience represents this experience as belonging to the rememberer—in other words, episodic memory contains a ‘sense of mineness’. In the first part of this talk, I shall argue that Lockeanism rests on reflexivism. In the second part, I shall argue against reflexivism. I shall conclude that Lockeanism rests on a mistake
